"Television Networks for your next favorite sport" and being broadcast by "Top-Rated sports Network for your favorite sports". How great does it feel to get the top prize, The Olympic final, including a once in a lifetime experience from the rest of the "blue team". At first it was very "cool" the competition and the pressure was to the next level, but as the night went on and the pressure kept building up to the very end and the show's end, you could see a look of disappointment in most of the players eyes. The medals were awarded to a phenomenal set of athletes who did not look fazed nor did they look like they were in "the zone", they looked like they were relaxing at a country club or bowling alley. Just look at the media. They look tired, like a run in the run in. They looked like they were ready for the off-season, but look at the competition! They looked like a bunch of "veterans", true professionals who didn't look like they were looking forward to the Olympics. A young female athlete, from the team, was being interviewed and she commented on how awesome the competition was. The interviewer asked her "you have put your all into this, how much does it mean to you to win?" The question was innocent enough and yet it gave the young lady pause. The pressure of being at the Olympics, the only international sports event in the world, is a heavy one and the weight on the young woman was simply overwhelming. She looked at the interviewer and said, "Every time I step on the pitch I just get hyped up, I feel like I'm going to explode". The interviewer, thinking she may be a bit overexaggerated, said "you do that everyday". She responded "No, everyday is like a dream come true". She continued with, "I can't wait until tomorrow and to run and put the final touches on my game". The interviewer then gave her an insight into the young woman's attitude, and the rest is history, the interviewer gave her an out and the young lady proved his point. Her attitude was infectious and she proved in spades that "Olympics Fever" is contagious. Today, with the Olympic fever sweeping the world, and many celebrities who have an interest in the Olympics, and are not living in a cave, has the sport of �
