Regulator: Georgetown University Student Shouldn't Have Been Approached By Natalie Sherman, Washington Post staff writer on May 25, 2002 Georgetown University student Linda W. Boyd said Thursday that a D.C. regulator had told her that she shouldn't have been asked by a company -- her former employer -- to approach her current employer, the university, about a job. In a statement about a proposed settlement of her sexual harassment complaint, Boyd says she agreed to allow an employment agency to contact her current employer "only on the condition of anonymity." That condition wasn't in the settlement agreement, but D.C. Department of Human Rights spokesman Tim Jackman confirmed Boyd's statements. Boyd said that company representatives contacted the university's HR department on March 10, and told HR that an executive was interested in a Georgetown education position for Boyd. Jackman said the violation occurred when Boyd agreed to talk to her current employer "only on the condition of anonymity." Jackman said the company "made a mistake" in not checking if that provision was in the settlement agreement, but he said that the company was trying to break the matter to her. He said that the settlement agreement was meant to resolve the complaint, which involved a sexual harassment claim. Boyd said that the company violated her privacy by using the anonymity condition in the settlement agreement. She said that the language, for "the highest level of confidentiality," was the only provision she gave to the company. Another provision of the settlement agreement said that Boyd could not talk about her employment with her current employer without approval from her lawyer and HR. "

These signs are often apparently ordinary, but they tend to arrive in every day, ordinary, and personally revealing ways. As such, the path is almost like a second spiritual life-experience, second to daily temple visits and prayers. This is one of the most effective paths, in that it is focused, it is effective, and it is not deluded. Daily temple life and prayer is sacred, but you can be wrong and deluded in your heart.
