Ketamine is a widely used N-methyl-D-aspartate receptor antagonist. While its drug-likeness has been well established, the drug has a narrow therapeutic range. Plasma protein binding studies have revealed that ketamine has a higher degree of protein binding than most other drugs. Recent studies have established that ketamine binds predominantly to human serum albumin (HSA). The binding parameters, including the binding affinity, number of binding sites, the binding volume, and the binding site, were evaluated by equilibrium dialysis and frontal analysis. The binding parameters to HSA were compared with those to serum free fatty acids. Ketamine bound to HSA with high affinity with a KD of 2.4×10^{-9}M. The binding of ketamine to HSA is rapid and reversible, and the binding of ketamine to HSA is accompanied by a marked decrease in the microviscosity of HSA. Ketamine showed the highest degree of binding to human serum albumin among the tested drugs. Free fatty acids significantly diminished the binding of ketamine to HSA. This was consistent with
