As a second in command at the Times, Gelfand used to oversee all staff writer salaries, and from his vantage point he learned a thing or two about how the industry operates. "The New York Times employs over 8,000 people, and it's complicated, because you have a lot of writers and photographers and editors and copy editors, a lot of people working in different capacities," he says. "Sometimes they need to increase the size of the team to meet the workload that is assigned to them, so they have to lay people off. Sometimes they have to reduce the size of the team, so they can lay people off. So those are the dynamics that are hard to explain and work with." But when it comes to the big bucks, he says, "The important part is not the person that's earning it. The important part is how it is used to build a business, how it's going to be managed and overseen and how it's going to be reinvested into the newsroom. That's the most important part of any salary structure, and the most crucial part of this particular situation is that the money that's going into that is being reinvested into the newsroom." The Times is not alone in this. The Washington Post, the Wall Street Journal, and The New Yorker are among the many publications that use their own substantial revenues to support their news
